Houston Jewellery is being totally remodeled

Houston Jewellery's newly redecorated lobby designed by Joel Brand of Brand-Allen Architects.

some prices will still continue to be 40 percent below the major department stores in town. In addition, regular Houston Jewelry customers can continue to shop in the outstanding and upscale gift department and the largest Canon camera department in the state.

Owner Andrew L. Solomon and son Rex are continuing in the tradition set by Grandfather Donsky of shrewd business management as well as his devotion to charitable work in the community. While Houston Jewelry was the first family owned discount department store established in Houston, it appears it will be the last survivor. The Donsky and Solomon families have set a proud record in the community.

Preparing to move aggressively into a different merchandising concept for the '90s, Houston Jewelry is liquidating its downtown location at 1301 Fannin.

Rex Solomon, third generation family member associated in the business, which was started by his grandfather Abe "Honey" Donsky in 1953, has stated that decreasing foot traffic over the past few months was one factor deciding to close downtown and focus everything at their 9633 Westheimer location. The sale has drawn hundreds of people and will continue until all the stock and fixtures are sold.

Remodeling at the Westheimer location is already in progress; the first phase will be completed by Thanksgiving. The perfume and cosmetic boutique are being expanded and the lobby area enlarged and completely refurbished. Rex said that since catalog shopping is now a "dinosaur", Houston Jewelry will become a department store much like Fortunoff's in New York. However,
